139 Pass me not, O gentle Savior
206 We walk by faith, and not by sight

The Gospel Procession: In the tradition of the Church, the reading of the Gospel is attended by marks of special honor. All stand for the reading, which is preceded and followed by acclamations directed to Christ, who is thereby acknowledged to be present in the reading of his gospel. All face the gospel book, and the person reading from it, throughout the reading and during the two acclamations.

The two lights carried in the gospel procession are both a token of joy and a symbol of Christ, the light of the world (John 8:12). The use of incense is also appropriate. The use of a processional cross at this point is not appropriate. The original purpose of the lights was to accompany the gospel book, a purpose that is obscured when a cross is carried, since they appear to be accompanying it instead. A cross, moreover, tends to call attention away from the book which should be the primary visual focus at this point. The person who previously carried the cross in the entrance rite should carry the gospel book accompanied by the lights.
